Excerpt from Annual Report of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the State of Maryland, for the Fiscal Year Ended September 30, 1901, to the General Assembly of MarylandIn the apportionment of this tax during the year, I have found the rule I established of distributing more equally among the counties and Baltimore City the quarterly installments thereof, has worked most admirably. The distribution heretofore made on the 1st day of June (close of the scholastic year), always exceeded very largely the other distributions, but by distributing an extra sum of on the first days of October and January and the 1st day of March, the several counties and Baltimore City have gotten the benefit of these amounts at once.About the PublisherForgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books. Excerpt from Annual Report of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the State of Maryland for the Fiscal Year Ended September 30, 1911, to the General Assembly of Maryland In my judgment, the General Assembly should not decrease this tax but let it remain as it is because it will afford a definite basis upon which the school authorities of this State may rely and under the new increased basis of assessment will yield a most generous support. The internal consistency test reveals that Maryland applies systematically higher "county" taxes to interstate commerce than to in-state commerce. Economic analysis of Maryland's tax regime -- including its taxes on inbound, outbound, and domestic activities -- confirms what the internal consistency test suggests, namely, that the Maryland "county" tax discourages interstate commerce. Specifically, the Maryland tax regime discourages Maryland residents from earning income outside of Maryland, and it simultaneously discourages nonresidents from earning income in Maryland. Maryland alone causes this distortion; the distortion does not depend on the taxes imposed by any other state. Petitioner's argument that Maryland's outbound tax regime should be upheld because it is facially neutral when compared to Maryland's domestic tax requires the Court to ignore Maryland's inbound tax on nonresidents. Ignoring relevant parts of a state's tax regime obscures the overall effect of that regime on interstate commerce. Although crediting other states' taxes would cure Maryland's dormant Commerce Clause violation, other practical and legitimate alternatives for curing the violation exist. Maryland, not the courts, should decide how to cure the constitutional infirmity in Maryland's tax regime.
