Powerful vocabulary boosting strategies plus over 200 vocabulary practice questions. Maybe you have read this kind of thing before, and maybe feel you don't need it, and you are not sure if you are going to buy this Book. Remember though, it only a few percentage points divide the PASS from the FAIL students. Even if our test tips increase your score by a few percentage points, isn't that worth it? Why not do everything you can to get the best score on the Nelson Denny? The purpose of this study was to examine the predictive validity of several variables to determine if the Florida Computerized Placement Test - Reading (CPT-R) score alone, or other variables, could determine whether or not a student would successfully pass the highest level college preparatory reading course. The study examined fall sessions 1997-2004 (n=276,079) reading scores for all forms of the CPT to determine at what standard deviation below the cutoff score of 83 a student could still successfully complete the highest level college preparatory reading course. According to the College Board, the 83 scaled score, which exempts a student from taking the reading course, equates to approximately a 70% on the paper/pencil version of the test, yet the study revealed that a scaled score of 64 was the average score for fall sessions 1997-2004, which according to previous studies equates to 9/10th reading grade level on the Nelson-Denny Reading Test (Napoli & Raymond, 1998). In addition, the most frequently obtained scaled score was 75 for fall sessions 1997-2004, which equates to an 11th grade reading level on the Nelson-Denny Reading Test; however, the results of this study showed only 61% (49, 281 out of 79,167) of the upper quartile of students (scaled scores >74) passed the highest level college preparatory reading course. Although a statistically significant relationship was found between the entry test and successful completion of the highest level college preparatory reading course, the relationship was small, and therefore does not provide very good predictive validity. Interestingly, the study revealed that students who were exempt from the reading course, and still enrolled in the course, did not have higher passing rates in the course. In addition, students with higher placement scores did not have significantly higher passing rates in the reading course than students with lower placement scores. In fact, students with the lowest scaled scores of 11-20 had the highest percentage of successfully completing the highest level college preparatory reading course. The placement test scores in reading indicate a large number of students entering Florida's community colleges are not prepared for college-level courses. In addition, the results of this study indicated that the placement test did very little to discriminate between levels of students' actual reading abilities and predict which students will ultimately pass required remedial/developmental reading classes. Implications from the results of this study affect both high schools and colleges. Although many first-time-in-college students are not recent high school graduates, high schools should be required to include reading as part of the core curriculum, separate and distinct from the language arts courses. Florida high schools need to implement intensive programs of study in reading because students are gravely underprepared for college studies. Teachers, credentialed in reading, should be teaching reading courses in all four years of high school. Diagnostic testing and year-end testing should occur each year to chart a student's progress for all four years of high school. In addition, Florida's college entrance reading placement test should be revised so that it provides a comprehensive measurement of college-level reading skills. Remember though, it only a few percentage points divide the PASS from the FAIL students! Even if our test tips increase your score by a few percentage points, isn't that worth it? "A study compared the performance of 44 applicants seeking admission to an alternative high school (n=19) and nursing assistant program (n=25) at a Wisconsin postsecondary institution on the Assessment of Student Skills for Entry Transfer (ASSET) test and the Nelson-Denny Reading Test. (Applicants who did not achieve a minimum score on ASSET then took the Nelson-Denny.) The hypothesis was that there would be no significant differences in applicants' performance as shown by the raw scores on the two tests. Three test cycles were scheduled. All 44 subjects took ASSET in the first test cycle. Subjects who were determined by a coin toss to be tested in cycle two with the Nelson-Denny and cycle three with ASSET were labeled Group 1 (n=21). Those who were determined by coin toss to be tested in cycle two with ASSET and cycle three with the Nelson-Denny were labeled Group 2 (n=23). A dependent t-test was used to analyze data. Students' performance on ASSET was significantly different from their performance on the Nelson-Denny. Students' performance on ASSET was also significantly different from their performance on a retest with the ASSET. The hypothesis was rejected in four of the five comparisons between performance on the ASSET and performance on the Nelson-Denny. It was recommended that multiple tests used for educational decisions such as placement must measure the same things and must measure what the curriculum deals with. (YLB)"--ERIC. Providing a new perspective on ADHD in adults, this compelling book analyzes findings from two major studies directed by leading authority Russell A. Barkley. Groundbreaking information is presented on the significant impairments produced by the disorder across major functional domains and life activities, including educational outcomes, work, relationships, health behaviors, and mental health. Thoughtfully considering the treatment implications of these findings, the book also demonstrates that existing diagnostic criteria do not accurately reflect the way ADHD is experienced by adults, and points the way toward developing better criteria that center on executive function deficits. Accessible tables, figures, and sidebars encapsulate the study results and methods. First published in 1995. Routledge is an imprint of Taylor & Francis, an informa company.

Specific Learning Disorder with impairment in reading (SLD-R) is the most widely diagnosed neurodevelopmental disorder. Individuals with SLD-R face many academic, social, and work challenges. To alleviate these difficulties, accommodations are provided, the most common being extended time for tests. The literature on extended time efficacy for SLD-R is mixed, with some research in support of extended time efficacy while other results range from no benefit to benefit for all populations. While outcomes differ, the majority of research shows that a standardized measure of extended time efficacy is necessary to determine an individual's level of needed accommodation. An alternate administration method of the Nelson Denny Reading Test is proposed in order to provide a specific and standardized measure within a stand-alone journal article created to be submission-ready for peer review. This novel administration technique will combine current standard and extended time conditions, and allow examiners to compare their client's abilities to age and grade matched individuals. Lastly, recommendations and limitations for this new administration method are discussed, and publication criteria for five journals to which I plan to submit this stand-alone article are reviewed.
